ABSTRACT

Current publications tend to omit or present scant information about the past and present achievements of Black American women in the visual arts. The purpose of this document is to justify the need for including more Black female achievers in more visual arts publications. As a result of this increased inclusion, the psychosocial function of role modeling for the mentor process will be enhanced in art history. Descriptions of the content of the 63 reference sources have been omitted in order to emphasize the listings of 538 Black women achievers. A review of these references has disclosed that these individuals achieved and are achieving in one or more technique areas--thus a representation of the complete range of art careers. This document is also a precursor to the first comprehensive publication and exhibition entitled "The Past and Present Achievements of Black American Women in the Visual Arts." Additional references--17--are included for the related subjects of art careers, art history, mentors and cross-gender mentors. (Author)

Abstract

Current publications tend to omit or present scant information about the past and present achievements of Black American women in the visual arts. The purpose of this document is to justify the need for including more Black female achievers in more visual arts publications. As a result of this increased inclusion, the psychosocial function of role modeling for the mentor process will be enhanced in art history. Descriptions of the content of the following 63 reference sources have been omitted in order to emphasize the listings of 538 Black women achievers. A review of these references has disclosed that these individuals achieved and are achieving in one or more technique areas--thus a representation of the complete range of art careers. This document is also a precursor to the first comprehensive publication and exhibition entitled The Past and Present Achievements of Black American Women in the Visual Arts. Additional references--17--are included for the related subjects of art careers, art history, mentors and cross-gender mentors.

SOURCES FOR THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF BLACK AMERICAN WOMEN IN THE VISUAL ARTS

There is a void in art history. Current publications omit or include scant information about the past and present achievements of Black American women in the visual arts. As a result, male and female art students do not have sources for a rich vicarious range of mentoring and cross-gender mentoring, especially with reference to the psychosocial functions of multiple role models.

This presentation of 63 reference sources is an attempt to rectify, in part, this limited or lacking form of vicarious ethnic mentoring between female artist-female student and female artist-male student. A classic art historical cross-gender mentor example is the male artist-female student relationship of Edgar Degas and Mary Cassatt. In addition, data from educational and corporate surveys indicate that role modeling definitely facilitates successful career development.

The listings for the references consist of a total of 538 Black women who are described in terms of their primary and secondary areas of art expertise. Because of the length of the printing space format, only primary and secondary areas are presented. However, some past and present women achievers were and are competent in more than two areas of art.

No effort has been made to describe the content of the references. Instead, the quantity of women and their achievements are emphasized.

No effort has been made to label these individuals as major or minor painters, sculptors, weavers, etc. Instead, the objective--through extensive listings--is to focus attention to the need for including more Black women in more visual arts publications. However, for this particular population, a sizeable number are major achievers. In addition--whether major or minor achievers--these women represent the complete range of careers in the visual arts.

A search of the literature will reveal that there is presently no comprehensive text in public domain devoted specifically to Black women in the fine arts. This document will be a precursor to a comprehensive publication; this publication will be a precursor to a major exhibition. The publication and exhibition will be entitled The Past and Present Achievements of Black American Women in the Visual Arts.
